Disease, injury stalk migrants

MYTILINEO, Greece, Oct 3 (AP) — As voices rise, diseases and injuries continue to stalk migrants from the Middle East and North Africa as they travel to Europe, adding to their suffering.

"There were many children with ear infections and skin rashes," said Dr. Demetrios Philippakis, the local doctor. "And there were some who were injured by the traffic on the road." He said six children had been treated for scratches and cuts from rocks and other debris.

Some leaders using crisis as

At the Gleneagles G8 summit in Scotland last year, leaders agreed to move the European Union closer to becoming a global player in the fight against climate change. In his speech, the German chancellor said the EU must take the lead in the fight against climate change.

"We cannot afford to be complacent," she said. "We must act now, or the consequences will be dire." The leaders agreed to work towards reducing greenhouse gas emissions by 20% by 2020.

Bombed Syrian family lands in France

Ahmed Rashid, his wife and three children, were among the thousands of Syrian refugees who arrived in France last week. They had been forced to flee their home in Syria due to the war and had been living in refugee camps in Lebanon for the past three years.

"We are grateful to France," said Rashid. "We have been treated with kindness and respect, and we feel welcome here." He said he and his family were looking forward to starting a new life in France and building a better future for themselves and their children.

More than 200,000 people have arrived in Greece in the past three months, with thousands more expected to arrive in the coming weeks.

"We are in a crisis situation," said Dr. Panagiotis Panou, the head of the Lesbos health centre. "The situation is critical, and we need immediate action to address the needs of these people." He said the centre was struggling to provide basic medical care and that more resources were needed.

"We are doing our best," he said. "But we need more help, and we need it now."
