The massive hangar will process 150 tonnes of waste daily from the town and its environs, creating thousands of jobs in a country that already suffers from high unemployment.

"The government has an enormous deficit, and then on top of that, add the weight of the displacement crisis," said Ibrahim, who escaped shelling in Aleppo five years ago.

With the influx of people, Bar Elias now handles 40 extra tonnes of refuse every day, in a country that already struggles to cope with its garbage mountain rising among the hills, or the open dumps that have emerged as the landfill overflows. "It's all garbage on top of garbage," said al-Alawi, who works in the nearby construction site. "We are the guardians of peace, we treat the matter with the utmost importance," Erdogan said.

"We are the guardians of peace, we treat the matter with the utmost importance," Erdogan said. "We do not think bringing the issue to a vote is a solution that is in line with the judgements of the leaders, of the people's mandate, of its MPs and ministries of its member states on changes of PKK links. The state's presence has been increased, its presence has doubled on the territory on which these PKK units are established in northern Iraq," Erdogan said.
