Going under knife in China

Plastic surgery is booming in China, fuelled by rising incomes, growing Western influences, and the impact of-looking good on social media. Some parents are even paying for teenage children to get work done to help them compete in what they see as increasing college admission pressure.

An Egyptian believes she is the world’s heaviest woman after shedding more than 100 kilograms in a brief hospital stay.

Eman Ahmed Abd El Aty, a 37-year-old woman, arrived at Burjeel Hospital in Abu Dhabi on Sunday and underwent bariatric surgery, a procedure to shrink the stomach, which is said to help reduce weight.

The surgery was performed by Dr. Li Jian, a surgeon at the hospital, who said it was the largest weight loss surgery he had ever performed.

The surgery lasted for more than six hours and involved removing 2.54 centimetres (one inch) of fat from the abdomen and one litre of stomach fluid.

The surgery was a success, and El Aty is expected to continue to lose weight with continued diet and exercise.

The surgery was performed without any complications, and El Aty is expected to make a full recovery.

The surgery was funded by El Aty’s family, who raised the money through crowdfunding.

El Aty has been struggling with her weight since she was a child, and has been denied passage to India to receive treatment.

In Abu Dhabi, doctors were able to perform the surgery, and El Aty has been discharged from the hospital.
