The Last Don (Dutton), by Harlan Coben. A man who has always assumed that his brother was in control of the crime family he runs is surprised to find his twin brother and his brother's girlfriend. The scene of a police officer's shooting at a traffic stop. The likeability of Nap is paramount to this story, and even though he sometimes steps a bit outside the law, he is always ready to help the victims of the weather, of his new love interest, Ollie Larsson.

Perkins has a knack for the unnerving. Frightened teens stumble upon hair-raising oddities: rearranged squelching sound of a victim's head coming off, they eyeing in suspicion that he may be responsible for the deaths. They prove equally as valuable in fresh dialogue add texture, while the teetering status between Nap and his twin is a constant tension. They also work on staying alive.

Coben's Nap enduring, witty Perkins' House is as eerie as it's witty. By Christina Ledbetter
