AFD hardens radical, anti-Muslim course

The far-right Alternative für Deutschland (AfD) party on Thursday said it would push its hardline on immigration and terrorism, if it succeeds in forming a government with the Christian Democrats (CDU/CSU) after elections next year.

"We would like to form a new government," AfD chairman Alexander Gauland told a news conference in Berlin. "But with the CDU we can't form a government that would harden or reform the immigration policy." Gauland said his party would push for a "complete ban on Muslim headscarves" in schools.

Gauland, who is running in Berlin, Germany's capital, for the AfD, said his party would try to stop any new immigration of Muslims to the country and would demand the "complete ban on Muslim headscarves and burqas in public spaces." He also said the party would demand a "complete ban on the wearing of the niqab" and a "complete ban on the wearing of the burqa in public spaces."
