RETURN TO SECULAR-BASED GOVERNMENT SEEN IN IRAQ

Al-Sadr seen moving closer to Iran

By Ahmed Al-Jarallah

Editor-in-Chief, The Arab Times

INTERNATIONAL news is usually slow because it is subject to the slow-motion groans of military accidents, but the hand of justice, especially crimes committed against civilians, moves at a different velocity.

This is the day that the worst of the past four years, the war that has been taking place, is finally being brought to an end. The international community has been calling for an end to the conflict for years, but today, for the first time, we see a glimmer of hope.

The war in Iraq has seen the destruction of many lives, the displacement of countless people, and the rise of criminal groups. But today, there is a possibility that we may see an end to this conflict, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace.

Al-Sadr has been working towards this goal for years, and today, with the support of the international community, he has achieved it. The united front of the world has called for a political solution to the conflict, and today, we see that it has finally been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.

The United Nations has called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, and today, we see that it has been achieved. The United States has called for a political solution, and today, we see that it has been achieved.

Al-Sadr's call for a secular government is a step in the right direction. It is a step towards the end of sectarian politics, and a step towards the end of the violence that has been tearing apart the country for so long.

The citizens of Iraq have suffered enough. They have lived through the horrors of war, they have lost loved ones, and they have watched their country be torn apart by the hands of those who sought power at any cost.

But today, there is hope. There is hope that the war is finally coming to an end, and that the people of Iraq can finally find peace and stability.