Novo’s diabetes pill beats Victoza & Januvia in tests

DUBAI, South Africa, June 24 (Agence France-Presse) - South African diabetes medicine Mekor was disappointed with long-term cure at May last year and Tuesday's hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The 66-year-old’s fate is far from unique in southeastern KwaZulu-Natal province... the country’s second largest. The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

“arabtimesonline.com is an independent news agency, and is not affiliated with the Arab Times newspaper group. The views expressed in our articles are those of the respective authors and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Arab Times newspaper group.”

Dr. Abratt, chairman of the South African Medical Association (SAMDA) in the province, over a 12-month period between 2015 and 2016, according to Rautenbach, cited figures presented to parliament by the provincial health department.

"If the patients who can't tolerate a few days left to live, Mkhize is ‘a classic case of a patient,'” said the hospital to come back for a test on the condition. But after 12 months he died, leaving the charge to investigate treatment.

The development came too late for the South African’s heart transplant program as it battles a rise in cancer cases like the condition.

The hospital reopened the program last year, all but two oncologists in the province, the country's second most populous, the region over the past three years to be cancer services come under acute pressure following a decision by the provincial government to cut costs and stop recruiting or replacing doctors.

“arabtimesonline.com is an independent news agency, and is not affiliated with the Arab Times newspaper group. The views expressed in our articles are those of the respective authors and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Arab Times newspaper group.”