Shinzo sets marks for days in office

TOKYO, Aug. 24 (AP) — Prime Minister Shinzo Abe on Monday became Japan’s longest-serving leader in terms of continuous elected office, but there were signs that he may not be able to continue much longer due to health issues.

Abe marked his 2,790th consecutive day in office, remaining at the top of the government. The 138-year-old nation has been governed by a series of strong leaders, including his own father, who died in 1993.

Abe’s health has been a concern for many months, as he has been dealing with the COVID-19 pandemic and the ongoing economic challenges. He has been under medical care for over a year and has canceled several public appearances.

In his farewell address on July 28, 2020, Britain’s Prime Minister Boris Johnson pledged to “set aside the fears of the past five months” and focus on the future. He also said that his government had “already won the war” against COVID-19.

However, Johnson’s government has faced criticism for its handling of the pandemic, with some experts questioning the government’s response and the accuracy of its statistics.

The government has also been criticized for its handling of the ongoing Brexit negotiations, with some experts predicting that the UK may not be able to reach a deal with the EU.

In his farewell address, Johnson acknowledged the challenges faced by the country and promised to work towards a better future. He also thanked the public for their support and said that he would continue to serve as prime minister.

A $32 billion plan to build an elevated train line in New York City is unlikely to be approved by the state, government officials said Monday, as it faces opposition from neighborhood groups in Queens and from environmental advocates who say it would do little to ease congestion in one of the nation’s busiest areas.

The Regional Charter Plan, which is the blueprint for the state’s transportation system, includes the plan to build the elevated train line to improve transportation in the city’s most congested areas. However, officials said the plan would need to be revised before it could be approved.

The plan, which was developed by the Metropolitan Transportation Authority (MTA), would have cost $32 billion to build and would have been funded by the state and federal government. It would have included four new stations along the line, which would have been built in a way that would not require the demolition of any buildings.

However, the plan faces opposition from neighborhood groups in Queens and from environmental advocates who say it would do little to ease congestion in one of the nation’s busiest areas. The groups say the plan would require the demolition of many buildings and would have a significant impact on the environment.

Asian film, music moguls fight arbitration

The New York Times published details of at least two new harassment allegations made against the network’s top executives.

Weinstein filed an arbitration claim against the network for failing to pay him for a documentary that he directed about the Harvey Weinstein scandal that brought down Weinstein, and against his former company, The Weinstein Co. That company has been struggling to find funding after New York State law claims.

Weinstein had opposed the deal, which also had included claims for discrimination against women.

Prosecutors in Los Angeles are seeking the extradition to California of a London-based producer accused of raping a woman and sexually assaulting another.

The future of the bankruptcy court overseeing Weinstein's case remains in doubt after a decision by a federal judge in California to throw out a proposed $150 million settlement reached between Weinstein and his accusers. Lawyers for several other alleged victims of the film producer have vowed to challenge the settlement and would have required approval by the bankruptcy court.

Some years ago someone passing by my house must have dropped a date stone in my front garden. It germinated and grew, and now I have a small palm tree, accidentally sown by a stranger who dropped a date stone in my front garden, is already yielding many kilos of fruit.

In Kuwait the most popular type of date is the adri, due to its buttery sweetness and the fact that it becomes delicious in all stages of ripeness. As dates ripen they become softer and darker in color and the sweetness becomes more intense. When still fresh and crunchy and either all yellow or all red, depending on the variety, they are known as khalas. When the bottom half of the fruit is soft and the top is still hard, they’re referred to as musabaha, a term which comes from the Arabic word ‘musabaha’, meaning half. It is at this stage, with their contrasting textures and flavors, that many people enjoy fresh dates the most.

Dates are fully ripe and use them later to make smoothies, for baking, to add to hot or cold cereals, as a topping to yogurt or ice cream. I also make a gluten-free version using gluten-free self-raising flour, which is usually available at Sultan Center.

In Kuwait it has long been the custom to share one’s date harvest with family, friends and neighbours. It is also a tradition to make delicious date pastries and cakes. In most Middle Eastern countries date pastries and cakes are among the more popular type of date products.

In Kuwait many shops located in Shuwaikh Industrial Area off of the Third Ring Road, the Mubarakiya souk, and in those frequented by tourists as well as seafarers. Loaded with minerals, vitamins, carbohydrates and natural sugar that can be converted into body energy, dates are one of nature’s most perfect foods.

Dates are certainly widely available in supermarkets, in the old Mutulakya souk, and in Souq Al Tamar. To the date collector and connoisseur there is no substitute for fresh dates. Fresh dates are the only way to taste the richness of date varieties available in the local market.

When dates are completely ripe they’re called tamar which in Arabic means moist or with humidity. Dried dates are called arras. Since they are transported, tamar have served as an invaluable food for desert travelers as well as sailors. NEWS/FEATURES

The scourge has killed more than 175,000 people, in New York alone, where 4,000 died on the Memorial Day holiday weekend accompanied by brutal heat. Experts believe the worst is yet to come.

THE SCOURGE OF THE COVID-19 PANDEMIC

Amidst the surge in cases and deaths, there’s a growing realization that the virus is not going to go away anytime soon. The latest statistics show that over 3 million people have been infected globally, with the United States accounting for more than a quarter of those cases.

Despite being one of the hardest-hit countries, the US is still struggling to contain the spread of the virus. As of last week, there were more than 80,000 new infections and over 1,000 deaths reported daily. Experts warn that this is just the beginning of the crisis, and that the numbers could rise even further as the weather warms up and more people gather indoors.

The US government has been criticized for its handling of the pandemic, with some arguing that lockdowns and mask mandates were too stringent while others claim they were not stringent enough. The lack of coordination between states and the federal government has also been a major issue.

As the virus continues to spread, there is increasing pressure on health care systems to keep up with the demand. Hospitals are forcing furloughs on workers and imposing strict visitation policies to conserve resources. The situation is particularly dire in hotspots like New York City, where hospitals are reaching capacity limits.

The pandemic has also had a profound impact on the economy. Businesses have been forced to close, and millions have lost their jobs. The unemployment rate hit a record high of 14.7% in April.

In the wake of the crisis, there is widespread calls for systemic change. Many are calling for better preparedness for future pandemics, as well as more equitable access to healthcare and resources.

In response to these calls, there have been some positive developments. The government has invested billions in vaccine research and development, and has started distributing vaccines to vulnerable populations. The WHO has also launched a global vaccination initiative to ensure that the vaccine is available to all.

However, there are concerns that the distribution of the vaccine is not fair, with wealthier countries lining up to secure doses ahead of others. The WHO has called for a more equitable distribution of the vaccine, and has launched a Covax initiative to ensure that all countries have access.

As the pandemic continues to unfold, there is a growing realization that we need to be better prepared for future crises. The lesson from this pandemic is that we need to be more resilient and adaptable, and that we need to prioritize public health and equitable access to resources.

College students stay online

Virtual class: students demand 'tuition cuts'

By Colin Blinsky

A new wave of students is demanding ‘tuition cuts’ in the wake of the coronavirus pandemic. It’s the latest in a series of protests by college students who feel they have been underserved and underrepresented.

Students are calling for universities to reduce tuition costs, arguing that the shift to online learning has made it easier for them to attend classes. They argue that universities are still making a profit from tuition payments, even though students are not physically attending classes.

“You’re paying that price tag because colleges stay online this fall, so you’re not getting your money’s worth,” said one student. “We’re not even in the dorms, we’re not in the libraries, we’re not getting that benefit.”

The protests have been fueled by a growing sense of frustration among students who feel they are not getting the value they are paying for. Many students say they are not satisfied with the quality of online classes and that they are not getting the same level of engagement and interaction as they did in-person.

University officials have been slow to respond to the protests, with some saying they are not yet ready to make changes. But there is growing pressure on universities to respond to the demands of students.

In response to the protests, many universities have announced plans to reduce tuition costs. Some have also announced plans to offer more online courses, making it easier for students to attend classes from home.

The protests have also sparked a broader debate about the future of higher education. Some are calling for a re-evaluation of the role of universities in society, and for a shift towards more online learning.

Despite the protests, many universities are still struggling to adapt to the new reality of online learning. The shift to online has been stilted and awkward, with many students expressing frustration at the quality of online classes.

But there is also growing hope that the crisis will bring about a re-evaluation of the role of universities in society. The shift to online learning has highlighted the importance of access and affordability, and has opened up new possibilities for learning.

Vegas Golden Knight Robin Lehner's shutout on Aug 24, marked the start of his third NHL playoff start, and he turned aside 26 shots. The 29-year-old Lehner, who is playing for his fifth NHL team, had a strong showing in his most recent win as he defeated the Minnesota Wild in the second round of the NHL playoffs. Lehner's performance was crucial in helping the team secure victory against the Wild in Game 1.

Alex Tuch, Mark Stone, and Max Pacioretty were among the players who contributed to the team's success. They blocked shots, back-checked, and wreaked havoc on the Wild's offense. The team's strength in numbers and collective effort was evident in their 5-0 victory.

The Golden Knights scored three times in the third period, with each goal coming from a different player, demonstrating their ability to adapt and capitalize on scoring opportunities. Lehner's shutout was the result of excellent teamwork and a strong defensive strategy, helping the team maintain their lead and secure a decisive victory.

The win is significant for the Golden Knights as it continues their streak of success in the playoffs. With this victory, they maintain their position in the NHL playoff rankings, and their chances of advancing to the Stanley Cup finals are strengthened.
